The subject of clean milk continues to become more and more important in the eyes of both consumer and producer. In a series of experiments W. A. Stocking of Massachusetts studied the effect upon the purity and quality of milk (as measured by bacterial content) of certain common dairy practices, such as feeding and brushing cows, stripping, etc. He found that feeding hay, dry corn stover and dry grain just before or at milking time greatly increased the bacterial contaminition of the milk. Brushing the cows at milking time had also a similar effect, because the hair and dust thus set free into the atmosphere settled into the milk pail. Wiping the flanks and udder of the cow with a damp cloth just before milking was very effective in reducing the bacteria content. Thorough stripping reduced the number of bacteria found in the milk at the next milking, while leaving a small amount of milk in the udder had directly the opposite effect.

The Fee the Dairyman Fights. Under ordinary methods of producing and handling, large numbers of bacteria get into milk. It is highly desiraisms into the milk and to so bandle it that the growth of those which do get in will be reduced to the minimum. It is possible to produce a grade of milk which shall contain but very few bacteria. This is demonstrated by some of the so called sanitary or certified milks which are now on the market, but these are produced at an increased cost and are sold at a price considerably above that of the regular market milk. At the present price which the average producer gets for his milk he cannot afford to greatly increase the cost of production. In order to meet the public demand for a better grade of milk he must therefore make
